The conservative Republican Study Committee rolled out a proposal for $1.6 trillion in spending and tax cuts Tuesday with the help of a new AI tool.

The "Byrd Bot," as House Budget Chairman Jodey Arrington (R-Texas) dubbed it, was developed by the RSC to sift through documents and generate legislation compliant with the Senate's Byrd Rule. The rule applies to bills passed using reconciliation, which requires a simple Senate majority rather than a 60-vote threshold to pass. Provisions must have a budgetary impact.

The bot marks a step forward in Congress' use of AI to legislate. If successful, it could avoid a frustrating process in the crafting of partisan budget bills.

House Republicans saw some of their pet priorities cut from President Donald Trump's signature 2025 tax-and-spending legislation because the policies were deemed ineligible by the Senate parliamentarian. The RSC's AI tool will help Republicans "generate compliant legislative text and preempt Democrat challenges," according to a summary of the "Reconciliation 2.0" blueprint.

"We should use AI as a tool for rooting out waste and fraud," Arrington said. "If the Byrd Bot can identify potential challenges for writing policies that would pass muster in reconciliation, then we can better anticipate those challenges, and we can prepare the language that would give us a better chance at passing some of these provisions."

Speaker Mike Johnson (R-La.) has repeatedly called for a second reconciliation bill in the new year, but many congressional Republicans doubt it's possible, especially given election year pressures. House GOP leaders have struggled to find a rallying point for their members after the passage of Trump's "One Big Beautiful Bill" last summer.

The House and Senate have internal guidelines on AI to ensure it's used safely. Lawmakers in recent years have experimented with AI tools in their offices to do research and accelerate tasks.
