

Johnson pledges to push ahead on another party-line megabill

The speaker remains “bullish” on prospects for a second reconciliation package and is starting to hold meetings on the matter.

Meredith Lee Hill 01/14/2026, 3:32pm ET

7 mins ago

Speaker Mike Johnson is making plans to craft another major, party-line policy bill — even as some of his own GOP committee chairs don't think such an undertaking is possible.

Johnson and a group of House Republicans, including Budget Chair Jodey Arrington of Texas, met Wednesday morning on the topic to discuss what priorities could fit into another filibuster-skirting budget reconciliation measure, Johnson told reporters Wednesday afternoon.

The speaker, who has promised hard-liners several times he would lead his conference in pursuit of another megabill after last year's success, reiterated he is very "bullish" on its prospects. He also said this was a topic of conversation when he spoke Tuesday with Senate Majority Leader John Thune during their regular meeting.

Johnson told reporters that any follow-up legislation to the "big, beautiful bill" of 2025 would be "House-driven," but he was confident the Senate would take up whatever the House passes.

His optimistic talk comes a day after the Republican Study Committee released a comprehensive blueprint for a second reconciliation bill, and House Majority Leader Steve Scalise said meetings on the matter were starting to ramp up.

Leadership will have to convince some of their skeptical members to come on board, however, as multiple chairs of key committees — including Ways and Means Chair Jason Smith — have said in recent months they don't see a path forward. The effort is especially perilous now given ideological differences and the narrower majority Johnson is navigating in an election year.

Lead Art: House Speaker Mike Johnson (R-La.) speaks with reporters as he walks to a vote at the U.S. Capitol Jan. 13, 2026. (Francis Chung/POLITICO via AP Images) | AP